Strategy, a word of Greek origin that means knowledge of a military general, has been used for centuries, but its brotherly term, strategic management, is a relatively new concept. Devised in the 1990s by Frederick W. Gluck and mckinsey consulting firm colleagues Stephen P. Kaufman and Steven Walleck, strategic management has four key elements: design-related funding, forecast-based design and externally focused design. Strategic management is itself the fourth and pinnacle element. Whether they are non-profit or for-profit entities, organisations must have plan, budget or clear understanding of operating costs. One of the main elements of each business plan is the economic element, which means how much it costs to start the business, the cost of maintaining growth and expansion, equity, return on investment, profits, liabilities and cash flow. Similarly, funding is fundamental to strategic management because it forms the basis of the Agency's ability to maintain its activities. Strategic management is not based on organisations becoming stagnant, regardless of whether the intention is to maintain original programme for the delivery of products or services. Market volatility, customer base fluctuations, technological developments and the transition to the labour market are signals that change is inevitable. Therefore, taking into account forecasts, forecasts or projections is of the utmost importance for the development of a strategic management plan. This element of strategic management can be more complex than the first, financial planning phase, simply because distinct skill sets are required to analyze factors that influence the development or expansion of the organization based on external factors, which brings us to the next phase, externally focused planning. SWOT analyses are known tools for developing a strategic management plan because they require an organization to consider strengths, weaknesses, opportunities and threats, hence the acronym SWOT that can separate successful businesses from unsuccessful ones. External factors are particularly important to take into account when assessing opportunities and threats. For example, an external opportunity could be the availability of the labour market when developing the strategic management plan for an organisation that needs skilled workers. Similarly, an external threat to an organization can be a competitor that offers high salaries and a generous benefit plan that affects your ability to attract the best qualified candidates. Other external factors are related to the environment, such as demographics or access to the company, for example, a new highway that drives traffic to the business location or the construction of roads that block entrances. When combined, the three elements: financing-related planning, forecast-based planning and abroad allow for a strategic management plan that moves from project to implementation. But the project doesn't stop just because you've created a well-coordinated strategic management plan. It's just begun. Implementing a strategic management plan requires strategic thinking, sound decision-making based on all four elements and top-down support from executive leadership who communicate their vision to staff often in charge of the companies running the strategic management plan. Strategic Investment Management, LLC is a large financial consulting firm in Arlington, Virginia that focuses on a variety of portfolio management services. Its customer base consists mainly of institutional investors, although the company also has some individual clients of high net worth.
